Sentinel on the Trail

Wagon Mound is the westernmost natural landmark on the Santa Fe Trail. It could be seen for miles by weary travelers making their way over the long and arduous trail. The promontory was named by the trail travelers for its resemblance to a large wagon pulled by oxen. Although a popular campsite for wagon trains, this spot was a favorite ambush spot for Indians. In May of 1850, a stagecoach bound for Santa Fe was attacked by Apache and Ute Indians. No one in the wagon party of 11 survived.

Santa Clara Springs

Just west of here is a favorite campsite of Santa Fe Trail travelers, affording abundant water and well-deserved rest. Santa Clara Springs had a permanent water supply and lush vegetation, just the thing for weary travelers crossing the dry landscape to the east of here.

Main Street USA

Walt Disney's hometown of Marceline today is much as it was when he lived here. The first plans of Disneyland show a remarkable resemblance to the town, with its store fronts on main street and locomotives coming and going. All who enter Disneyland travel down the main street Walt created from his memories of his childhood in Marceline. He hoped to give all visitors the impressions and sensations he had in Marceline as a boy. Walt wanted people to feel comfortable, he wanted them to feel like they were coming home. Welcome to the original Main Street USA.

Happy Canada Day all! We saw a moose this am, Yahoo! This map at the Travel Manitoba Visitor Center is very useful. As the nice lady at the desk told me, Manitoba is skinny. It took us camping 3 nights in Ontario to get across that province. There's a tiny Canadian flag marking where I am right now - on the Manitoba/Ontario border.

THE NAMING OF INDIAN HEAD

In the 1800s the population of the First Nations people was ravaged by diseases such as small pox brought west by the fur traders.

Their remains were placed on the hills southwest of town which became known as Indian Head Hills.

The CPR arrived in 1882 and the townsfolk proposed to call this community on the relatively flat plains, Indian Head.

The Indian Head statue was commissioned in 1985 to honor this history.
