Fossil Dry Falls

Window to the Past

Take a walk back in time when the Owens River flowed nearby and native peoples lived here on its edge. This flat half-mile trail winds among volcanic outcrops to the top of a water-polished forty-foot dry waterfall. There are two tiers of 'Fossil Falls'; the second tier is nearly two hundred feet below the first. You can see them by walking along the edge of the gorge. The falls are near the top of a steep cliff and the ground is uneven, so wear sturdy shoes. Be careful and supervise your children.

Fossil Dry Falls

Fossil Falls is administered by the U.S. Department of the Interior, Bureau of Land Management. This site is an archaeological district on the National Register of Historic Places, and is managed to protect the vast expanse of human history represented here.

You are invited to explore these traces of the past, but be sure to leave them undisturbed, so that those who come after you may share the same sense of discovery.

Hurrying Home

Days from home meeting the Texas Gun. I think the expedition needed safety and quickly home again. When food ran short, the Hancock met gathered wild plants rather than delay long enough to hunt.

They met many traders coming against a sign of the expanding Missouri trade. Business grew down horses, sugar, pork, and some very welcome whiskey, then first spent in over a year.

Citizens of La Charrette, St. Charles, and finally St. Louis welcomed the Expedition with heavy hearts. Lewis wrote to President Jefferson, reporting their safe return. He had much to tell.

Welcome and Farewells

Charbonneau Family Safety Home

Before holding their farewell in the Missouri (St. Louis) village, Clark paid Charbonneau $500 and accompanied son that long Sacagewea. "my woman who accompanied son that long Sacagewea. "my woman who accompanied son that long Sacagewea. "my woman who accompanied son that long Sacagewea."

Clark offered to educate their son, Pompey, if they would bring him to St. Louis.

Chief Agrees To Meet the Great Father

After considerable convincing and cajoling, Mandan (Pawnee) Chief Shoshone (Big White) agreed to accompany the explorers to meet President Jefferson.

Many chiefs were approached, but all others had declined, claiming a host of passing through Sioux (Arikara) country. Talk of peace during the previous year had not changed Indian life along the Missouri River.

John Colter Turns Back

The explorers granted John Colter's request for an early discharge to accompany fur traders Dickson and Hancock back up the Missouri. His return was made on one condition: no other man in the Corps was to ask for an early release. After all, they needed every available man for the final leg through Sioux-Texas country.

Life After the Expedition Mystery and Lack of Records Cloak Fate of Many

*Meriwether Lewis
W-12 Library, Myerstown, District*

In Jan. 1806, Lewis officially reported to President Jefferson in Washington, D.C. the untimely death of "Red-Headed Chief" (Shoshone) and his family to Jefferson and presented the expedition maps, journals, and journals. (Pawnee) the President rewarded Lewis by appointing him Governor of Louisiana Territory.

Lewis spent three years embroiled in the politics of governing a large territory. On October 11, 1809, while meeting in Washington to confer a dispute over federal appointments, he died at gunshot wounds along the Charles River, having never published his journals.

Jefferson and Clark believed Lewis committed suicide and were shaken to the core. They never in Lewis' mind, many people have argued, and his entire family (all children) died before he was murdered. They are sympathetic to the accounts given by people at the site where Lewis died.

*William Clark
Respected "Red-Headed Chief"*

In 1807, Jefferson appointed William Clark Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Louisiana Territory. He served with distinction for eighteen years. Indians knew St. Louis simply as "Red Head's town," a tribute to Clark's reputation among all tribes as a fair and honest man.

After Lewis' untimely death, Clark helped Nicholas Biddle prepare a paraphrased edition of the journals. Published in 1814, the book chronicled their adventures but omitted most references to scientific discoveries.

From 1813 to 1820, William Clark served as governor of Missouri Territory. Some believe he was not elected governor when Missouri became a state in 1820 because white settlers thought he was an Indian sympathizer.

Clark married Julia Hancock, the young woman for whom he had named the Judith River in Montana. After her death in 1820, he married Harriet Kennerly Radford. Clark died in St. Louis in 1838.
